Your Water Softener requires Annual Maintenance!

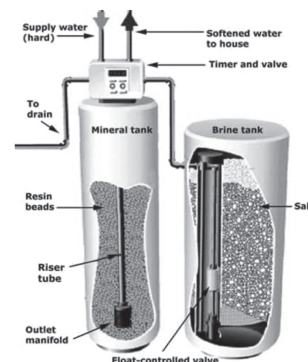

A water softener works by removing the magnesium and calcium present in your water supply through a process of ion exchange, turning it from hard water to softened water. Unlike hard water, softened water does not damage your home's piping or cause a build-up of scale in your appliances, reducing their effectiveness and lifespan.

By softening your water, you can protect your home from harmful build-up. At the same time, eliminate limescale (which is only present with hard water) and improve your family's skin and hair, too.

Knowing how to clean a water softener resin tank is crucial since this tank is responsible for the unit's softening capabilities. If you're unfamiliar with a resin tank, don't worry; it's straightforward. Your water softener contains resin beads that are negatively charged as your water passes through these beads; scale-causing minerals like calcium stick to them.

Typically, your water softener will flush these beads clean. It's a common misconception, though, that you "never" need to service them until the replacement interval of 15 to 20 years. On the contrary, you need to give them a good cleaning at least once or twice a year. You'll know it's time when the tank regenerates more frequently than usual. There are plenty of bottled resin bead cleaners on the market; refer to your unit's manual for specific instructions.

Water softener maintenance is the key to long-term performance. Heavy duty water softener cleaner extends your softener's life by removing organic and mineral buildup as well as preventing rust and mineral staining. The water softener cleaner helps keep your water softener running at peak efficiency. The water softener cleaner teams up with your salt to reduce the harmful containments in the water that affect the softener's efficiency and eventually destroy it. Some softeners need as little as four ounces of cleaner to get the job done (for more information can be found in the owner's manual). Please see Barnesville Drug and Hardware for products they carry.
